The greatness of the service must stand in some relation to the intrinsic worth of the interests served. So they who have served the mental, moral or natural interests of the world take rank so-cording to the world take rank so-cording to the world of those interests. No real error can be rendered in a world like this without self-meritor. True service is costly service, whatever tends to culture this temper is in part the culture of true greatness.

The first characteristic of this viscious tem-per in men is the perverse preference which it gives to the accidents before the essence, the shadow before the substance. It pre-first fame, the shadow—to true greatness itself. The second vice in the striving for greatness is the mistake of thinking it a thing of imitation. Affecting the peculiari-ties of the great is the weakest and most peurile of all such imitations. Men reveal their own insignificance by comparison with the unapproachable models which they would imitate. Another form of this minniery of greatness assumes is the illusion that it is throats

After thus characterizing the Remance of Greatness, we now consider its reality. This consists of a "just estimate of its real mature and a manly and carnest culture of its real editments."
